Promoting construction of safe, healthy, habitable buildings

Farm Buildings and Farm Residences in The Construction Codes Act

Overview

The Construction Codes Act (the CC Act) replaced The Uniform Building and Accessibility Standards Act as the legislation that governs the construction and occupancy of buildings in Saskatchewan, effective January 1, 2022.

Farm buildings remain exempt from construction standards. The CC Act and The Building Code Regulations (the BC Regulations) provide definitions to help distinguish between exempt farm buildings and non-exempt buildings located on agricultural land for the purpose of applying construction standards.

Farm residences and other buildings where sleeping accommodation is provided on a regular or temporary/seasonal basis are not farm buildings and are not exempt from construction standards. They must comply with applicable provisions of the National Building Code of Canada adopted for use in Saskatchewan. Existing farm residences remain exempt unless renovations or additions were started after January 1, 2022.

Although farm buildings are exempt from construction standards under the CC Act, local authorities can choose, through their building bylaw, to require farm buildings to comply with construction standards and to get building permits.

Before any construction begins, building owners are recommended to contact their local authority to discuss their project.

For more information, the applicable provisions of the CC Act, the BC Regulations and The Agricultural Operations Act are provided below.

Consult Your Local Authority

The application of Saskatchewan building standards is a shared responsibility that includes a role for the building owner, the local authority (i.e., the municipality), the Government of Saskatchewan, the building official and architects, engineers and contractors.

Contact your local authority before you begin any renovation or construction projects, since each situation is unique and requires special consideration. Discussing your project with the municipality and their appointed building official can help you by ensuring your building project complies with all construction codes before you begin.
